Stockholm

Hej! Welcome to Sweden... With its thousands of coastal islands and inland lakes, Sweden is certainly the place for fun.

Day to day life

Swedes tend to value personal space and privacy, but they also place a high value on socializing with friends and family. The popular Swedish tradition known as fika, a coffee break that usually involves pastries or cake while socializing with coworkers or friends, demonstrates the importance of socialization.

The average wake up time for Swedes is between 7:19am and 7:22am. They get up early to get ready and leave the house early for work or school.

They make their breakfast, eat it and clean their bodies, then they get dressed, do their hair, teeth, then leave the house, normally to get on a train to Stockholm if you are going to work or school.

Food &

1. Lingonberries go with anything. Just like ketchup and mustard, lingonberry jam is widely used to accompany a variety of dishes, from meatballs and pancakes to porridge and black pudding (blodpudding). But despite its sweetness, it is rarely used on bread. Thanks to the right of public access (allemansrätten) which gives everyone the freedom to roam and enjoy nature, many &wedes grow up picking lingonberries in the forest, and using these tiny tart red fruits to make a jam-like preserve. 2. Pickled herring-centre of the smorgasbord. You might swap meatballs (köttbullar) for mini sausages (prinzkorvar) or pick cured salmon (gravlax) rather than smoked, but your smorgasbord wouldn't be complete without picked herring (sill). This delicious favourite remains the basis of every typical &wedish buffet. &wedes have been pickling since the Middle Ages, mainly as a way of preserving the fish for storage and transportation. Pickled herring comes in a variety of flavours - mustard, onion, garlic and dill, to name a few - and is often eaten with boiled potatoes, sour cream, chopped chives, sharp hard cheese, sometimes boiled eggs and, of course, crisp bread. 3. Crisp bread-what's your favourite topping? In addition to bread and butter, you will often find a type of crispbread (knäckebröd) served alongside your main meal. This is what the Swedes tend to reach for. Once considered poor man's food, crispbread has been baked in Sweden for over 500 years, can last for at least a year if stored properly, and remains among the most versatile edible products. Crispbread comes in various shapes, thicknesses and flavours, with entire store shelves devoted to it. It can be topped with anything from sliced boiled eggs with tube caviar (breakfast) to ham cheese and cucumber slices (lunch) to just plain butter as a side dish (dinner).
